Description:

In the years following the pandemic, the dominant narrative of “learning loss” has shaped national discourse—but how well does that story reflect the experiences of students in independent schools? In this webinar, we’ll explore findings from our latest research on student learning growth and well-being, drawn from five years of data across NAIS schools. By examining both achievement and well-being trends before and after COVID, we’ll offer a more nuanced understanding of how students are growing—academically and personally—within independent school environments.

Bio: Kelly Bornmann: Senior Director of Educational Services at the Educational Records Bureau (ERB)

Kelly Bornmann Bio: Kelly is a nationally recognized leader in helping educators transform complex data into meaningful action, while championing the essential role well-being plays in both student success and educator efficacy. As Senior Director of Educational Services at the Educational Records Bureau (ERB), Kelly leads national and regional professional development experiences, guiding educators in using data to inform decisions. With teaching credentials in New Jersey and California, Kelly has taught in independent, faith-based, and public schools across multiple states, accumulating over 2,500 hours of advanced professional development along the way. Her work includes leading innovative science curricula, advisory programs, and technology integration initiatives, while also contributing to professional organizations such as ISTE, NSTA, and many independent school associations, including NAIS, CAIS and NYSAIS. Whether through conference presentations, mentoring, or facilitating educator networks, Kelly has helped thousands of educators connect instructional strategies with school culture, creating spaces where both students and teachers can thrive.
